Corvinus is among the world's best business schools - Financial Times' Top Business Schools

7th December 2015

Financial Times has compiled its annual ranking of European business schools. In 2015, the Faculty of Business Administration, i.e. the Corvinus Business School retained its 79th position on this prominent top list of great renown.

In its annual assessment, the Financial Times selects the best of Europe's several hundred business schools, out of which only four institutions made it to the top list from the region (one of them is a private university, and another one is the ancient university of St. Petersburg with a capacity of over 23,000 students); so Corvinus has shown its excellence on an international scale once again.

Besides business schools, Financial Times also ranks business MA/MSc trainings. The ranking of elite trainings, published in late summer, lists the Faculty of Business Administration of the Corvinus University of Budapest on multiple accounts.

The list, which rates several thousand trainings, ranks CEMS Masters in International Management programme on the 4th place. This programme is operated by 30 leading business schools, and the Faculty of Business Administration of the Corvinus University of Budapest has been one of them for almost 20 years.

Coming up two places since 2014, the Faculty's Management and Organisation MSc training finished 68th in 2015, overtaking many important institutions in the region (University of Economics, Prague, Warsaw School of Economics), as well as outstanding business schools such as the University of Bath Business School, Manchester Business School, BI Norwegian Business School and Lancaster University Management School.

15 institutions from the business school top list - like HEC Paris (2nd), University of St. Gallen (4th) and ESADE Business School (5th) - are CEMS members along with our Faculty of Business Administration.

In relation to all the great news above, the university is especially proud that one of its students, Andrea Baji (International Business BSc, International Management MSc) wrote an article at request for Business Education, a special edition of Financial Times, about her CEMS studies.
